Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to a harness assembly and more particularly to a harness assembly for use with the user. 2. Description of the Prior Art With the advent of the modern day child, it has become necessary to form the child with a particular set of characteristics so that the child can be adapted to cope with the ever changing society. Due to the ever increasing demands placed upon the young child, such as the child required to perform and assume the responsibilities of the adult, it has been recognized that the child should be provided with the proper physical attributes so that the child is capable of handling his needs and requirements. It has been found that the typical baby or infant is not specifically provided with a harness assembly which will accommodate the needs and requirements of the child so that the child is capable of accomplishing its necessary and expected duties. In the past, the means of handling the child included positioning the child within the infant's car seat and effecting the attachment of the harness assembly to the child. This attachment arrangement was such that the child was unable to move about freely within the vehicle without the risk of injury. Further, it was difficult for the child to perform certain duties while the infant's car seat was attached to
